Letter from the Ambassador

Adversity is a great teacher and the people of Bulgaria know that better than most. In the face of difficult challenges, this country has responded with courage, creativity, and unwavering determination. The progress that Bulgaria has already achieved has proven that even more is possible. It has also proven the truth of Emerson's famous words: "when it is dark enough, you can see the stars."

During the course of this month, we wanted to look beyond the darkness of economic crisis and political uncertainty and to reach for new ideas, new approaches that would do more than just solve problems but that would also create a whole new range of possibilities. We've focused on innovation in a variety of forms and issue areas – and found the results fascinating.

First, we've been exploring new ways to communicate – more directly and immediately – with people throughout this country and around the world. We invited Bulgarians to participate in Secretary Clinton's Town Hall meeting that used the internet to connect with future leaders all across Europe. We've also launched a monthly interactive webchat that will create opportunities for regular dialogue between Bulgarian citizens and Embassy officials on issues ranging from visas to security to political debate. Our new Embassy webpage, unveiled this month, has a special feature inviting your comments and questions about U.S. policy, and we hope to hear from you soon.

We've also organized several events to highlight how innovation has changed our world and the way we deal with it. We hosted a digital videoconference with Pulitzer-prize winning journalist David Vise, author of The Google Story, to discuss his insights about this company and the phenomenon it has created. We also took part in Microsoft's Innovation Day, as it launched the Center for Innovative Education at Sofia Technical University along with its BizSpark program to support fledgling IT entrepreneurs. And we set up a dialogue with prominent Bulgarian bloggers to discuss issues of common concern and to consider how blogging has changed the nature of political and economic analysis.

"Traditional" issues like security and energy are also in urgent need of innovative solutions. NATO's 60th anniversary summit is explicitly looking to devise new solutions to the security challenges of Afghanistan and global terrorism. Similarly, it is critical that we cooperate to develop more rational and reliable approaches to our energy needs – both to ensure national security and to protect the health of our planet. We've worked to boost official dialogue while also modifying our personal practices here at the Embassy with recycled paper and the purchase of a hybrid vehicle.

None of these measures – on their own – represent a complete solution. But taken together they offer the potential for real progress. And they give us a chance to actually reach for those stars we can see through the darkness.

Ambassador McEldowney Live on Bulgarian TV Morning Show

On March 26, Ambassador McEldowney appeared live on the popular "This Morning" show on bTV. She addressed a number of issues including the global economic crisis; the U.S. support for the Bulgarian authorities' struggle against corruption and organized crime; as well as the upcoming NATO Summit and Bulgaria's 5th anniversary in NATO.

The Ambassador said that the governments need "to act quickly and in coordination" in order to cope with the global financial and economic crisis. She drew attention to the serious problem of vote buying, and pointed out that the Integrity Pact would bring to transparency in the electoral process. The lack of justice, she said, is a common complaint she has heard from the Bulgarian people during her travels throughout the country. Throughout the interview, Ambassador McEldowney underscored the value of the strong U.S.-Bulgarian relationship, and the strong U.S. commitment to the people of Bulgaria.

NATO Spokesperson Answers Questions of Bulgarian Journalists

On March 13, the U.S. Embassy organized a video-conference with Bulgarian journalists who had the opportunity to speak with NATO's spokesperson, James Appathurai. He answered a wide range of questions about the Bulgarian candidate for NATO Secretary-General, Solomon Passy, the Bulgarian contribution to the mission in Afghanistan, and the future of the Alliance. Ambassador McEldowney facilitated the event and said that the nomination of Passy is an example of the active participation of Bulgaria and its contribution to the Alliance.

Ambassador Steven Mann Addresses Energy Issues on Bulgarian National Television

Popular political talk show Panorama aired an interview with Deputy Assistant Secretary of State Steven Mann on Friday, March 13, featuring topics related to the gas crisis that struck Europe in January, the necessity of a common energy policy by European nations, and the new U.S. administration's approach toward the energy issue. Ambassador Mann pointed out that the United States conducts a consistent and anti-monopolist policy and that the recent gas crisis had shown that Europe needs diversification and a common policy on energy security.

Ambassador McEldowney Engages in Lively Discussions with Prominent Bulgarian Bloggers

On March 25, Ambassador McEldowney met with prominent Bulgarian bloggers and shared her ideas on the role of bloggers in society. The Ambassador talked about the importance the Embassy places on reaching out to people through the means of new media, and shared her experience in blogging and social networking. The bloggers offered personal insights on the Bulgarian online media, the influence of the blogs and social networks, the challenges that Bulgaria is facing in the run-up to the National Elections, and their vision about Bulgaria's future. Overall, the exchange of ideas was mutually educational as everyone realized the growing popularity of blogging as a serious form of communications that is accessible to virtually anyone who uses the internet.
